Name: Ken Erik Y. Justiniani
Course & Year: BSCS-DS 3

This particular tree is one of the most essential parts of the environment, as it houses organisms such as ants, birds, and many more. It is surrounded by a square stone bench that acts as its barrier against those who want to harm the tree. The people care for and protect this tree as if it were part of them.

The trees, in general, are essential to us living organisms. Giving us benefits such as oxygen, acting as a shade against the harmful rays of the sun, and giving shelter to animals and insects. This activity made me feel grounded again, feeling the connection from the earth's core up to my inner core.